[CNE26] The message in the wall

It is the year 1425. The city of Amersfoort is surrounded by thick walls and deep moats. Outside the walls lie fields and farms, while within, a bustle of activity prevails: bakers, tanners, and craftsmen fill the streets with the aroma of bread and leather.

On the edge of the city, where the Muurhuizen (Wall Houses) now stand, lives Lise, the daughter of a merchant. Her brother, Thomas, is traveling to Utrecht, but he wants to send her a secret message—something that mustn't fall into the wrong hands. However, the city gates are closed for the night. Lise knows that along the old city wall, a small, hidden passage still exists, a remnant of the first wall. There, between two houses—one with a wooden facade, the other with a stone stepped gable—she comes every evening to see if the guards are watching.

In the darkness, she hears a soft whistle: three short notes, one long. That's the signal! From the shadows, a boy climbs onto the wall. He carries a leather bag bearing her brother's seal. "The message," he whispers, disappearing back into the night.

When Lise opens the parchment, she reads only one line: "Keep the trade route—the secret lies in the wall itself."

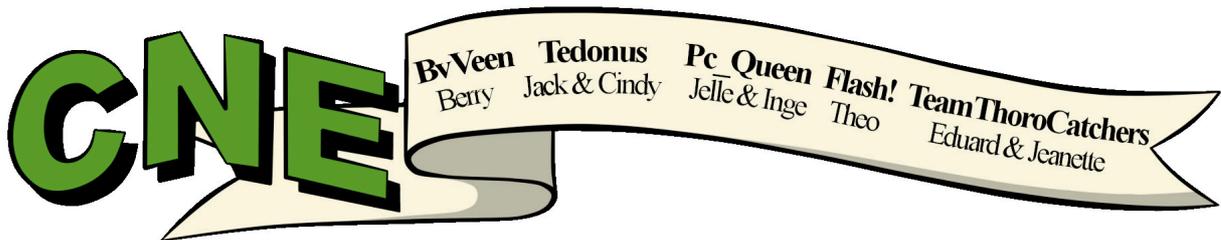

Since then, it's been said that a message was immured in the walls of the Wall Houses—a letter, a coin, or perhaps a token that was never found.
